It's good to see more of what they actually do in the peer review process and comparing what they do to what native speakers do is a good juxtaposition. I think that you got some good results from this approach and I enjoyed reading about it. The limited scope of your inquiry worries me a little. Not regarding the number of participants, but rather that this was a one-shot peer review session. You would have likely seen big changes on both groups over 2-3 review sessions as participants get comfortable with the practice. You also mention in the results that the NSs might have been experienced with peer review (I'd like to hear more about that), but you didn't mention whether the NNSs had experience with it. This knowledge of/comfort with peer review can make a big difference. Though this is debated amongst qualitative researchers, frequency counts can bolster your findings and add heft to claims, such as X happened more in one group than another. Again, with a limited scope, this could be difficult, but without it, a reader might believe that one instance does not support a trend. I did not include this in the request for revisions, but I suggest it for your future endeavors. I have provided a detailed proofreading of the manuscript using the reviewing features of MS Word. The limited scope of your inquiry worries me a little. Not regarding the number of participants, but rather that this was a one-shot peer review session. You would have likely seen big changes on both groups over 2-3 review sessions as participants get comfortable with the practice. You also mention in the results that the NSs might have been experienced with peer review (I'd like to hear more about that), but you didn't mention whether the NNSs had experience with it. This knowledge of/comfort with peer review can make a big difference. Though this is debated amongst qualitative researchers, frequency counts can bolster your findings and add heft to claims, such as X happened more in one group than another. Again, with a limited scope, this could be difficult, but without it, a reader might believe that one instance does not support a trend. I did not include this in the request for revisions, but I suggest it for your future endeavors. I have provided a detailed proofreading of the manuscript using the reviewing features of MS Word. The file is attached.
